Description

The RAVEN (Routing Attack Vulnerability Evaluation for Networks) project aims to build on further research results established during the ERC Netvolution project to build a new PoC of a BGP prefix hijacking vulnerability assessment service. Moreover, it will investigate the key challenges of the commercialization of such a service: namely, 1) estimating the associated costs and planning the optimal expansion strategy for rolling out the global peering infrastructure that is needed; and 2) defining (based on the design thinking methodology) the product offering for such a service; this is new ground for the Internet, since nothing similar exists today.

The candidate will carry out assisting duties for the project, covering general research support. For the project's technical aspects, he/she is expected to assist in software maintenance tasks, indicatively handling tasks such as overlooking the execution of distributed simulations/emulations, automating processes and assisting in writing reports.

- Currently enrolled to a University Graduate Program in Computer Science, Electrical Engineering or related fields.
- Prior experience in the field of Internet Measurements.
- Fluent knowledge of English.

- Excellent ability to work as a part of a team.
- Professional behavior.
